Emphasizing the contrast between life in the 1920s and 1930s

The 1920s and 1930s were two very different eras. The '20s were a time of wealth, prosperity, and an enormous sense of national pride. While in the '30s, those things seemed to be submerged in the grief of the depression and the economic failure. The most evident difference between the '20s and '30s is the financial accomplishment of the depression. In the '20s, people were purchasing credit, borrowing money constantly and betting like there was no future with the judgment that there was no end to the quantity of money that one could get. In the 30's the reality of that was shown and got proven. In the early 1920s, most of Canada was composed of small farming villages. Over time, Canada became more mechanized and city-like. Automobiles were trendy in the 1920s. With the economy rising in the 20s, soon after the war, many people could afford them. However, the depression greatly touched car production. The depression led to many people not being able to afford cars nor maintain them. This climactic fall in sales caused many people involved in car production to lose their jobs and cannot afford to feed their families. Conclusively, the 30s was a colossal disaster for the American and Canadian Economies and many people suffered from that. President Herbert did not do much to alleviate the trauma. He only argued that there was patience and self-reliance needed to get them through this incident so that made things even worse. Thankfully, in 1932, Americans elected a new president, Franklin Delano, who promised to use the power of the federal government to make Americans' lives better.
